1.1 Passage A

Identify Electronic Commerce

Electronic commerce refers to the buying and selling of products or services over electronic systems such as the Internet and other computer networks. The amount of trade conducted electronically has grown extraordinarily since the rapid spread of the Internet. A wide variety of commerce is conducted in this way, which leads to innovations in many aspects such as electronic funds transfer, supply chain management, Internet marketing, online transaction processing, electronic data interchange (EDI) and so on.

Modern electronic commerce typically uses the World Wide Web at least at some point in the transaction's process, although it can include a wider range of technologies such as e-mail. A large percentage of electronic commerce is conducted entirely electronically for virtual items such as access to information you want on a website, but most electronic commerce involves the transportation of physical items in some way.

Online retailers are sometimes known as e-tailers and online retail is sometimes known as e-tail. Almost all big retailers have electronic commerce presence on the World Wide Web. Electronic commerce that is conducted between businesses is referred to as business-to-business or B2B. B2B can be open to all interested parties in course of trading or limited to specific, pre-qualified participants. Electronic commerce that is conducted between businesses and consumers, on the other hand, is referred to as business-to-consumer or B2C. This is the type of electronic commerce conducted by companies such as Amazon. Electronic commerce is generally considered to be the sales aspect of e-business. It also consists of the exchange of data to facilitate the financing and payment aspects of the business transactions.

Broadly speaking, electronic commerce is the production, advertising, sale and distribution of products via telecommunications networks. No matter what we call it, it is no doubt that electronic commerce has changed our consuming habit a lot and brought a great deal of benefit and convenience to both businesses and consumers as well. We also believe that the definition of electronic commerce will continue to evolve, expand and vary in different eyes in the future.

1.4 Passage B

The Evolution Of Electronic Commerce

As is known to all, people have conducted business with each other for thousands of years. They have adopted new tools and technologies as they have become available. For example, the advent of sailing ships in ancient times opened new ways of trade to buyers and sellers. The printing press, the steam engine, and the telephone, each changed the way people conducted commerce activities.

The Internet was opened to commercial use during the early 1990s. That time period also saw the development of Web server and Web browser software. By 1995, the rapid growth of the Internet and the Web had combined with the proliferation of personal computers in homes and businesses to create a new communications network that could support business transactions as nothing ever had before. These three factors — the commercialization of the Internet, the invention of the Web, and the rapid growth of networked PCs — combined to make electronic commerce possible.

The number of Web sites is currently estimated to be well over eight million and the number of Web documents over a billion. Each Web site can have hundreds or even thousands of individual Web pages. As more people obtain access to the Web, commercial interest in using the Web to conduct business will increase and the variety of non-business uses will become even greater.

Although the Web has already grown very rapidly, many experts believe that it will continue to grow at an increasing rate for the foreseeable future. The emergence of the Internet and the Web as new data communication tools is just another step in the increasing efficiency of business processes.

1.8 Expanding Reading

The Internet

Today, the Internet is an enormous network of millions of computers allowing constant communication throughout the world. It includes: the World Wide Web, electronic mail (E-mail), File transfer Protocol (FTP), Internet Relay Chat (IRC) and USENET (news service).

The World Wide Web is the part of the Internet that most users see and use and which has made it so popular. The web continues to grow at an absolutely incredible rate. Technology has improved to such an extent that the web is now considered to be indispensable for education, business and entertainment. There are billions of pages on the web and thousands more are added every hour.

E-mail

Anyone can apply for an E-mail address and send and receive messages from their computer. The main benefit is the almost instantaneous delivery of messages. An E-mail to the other side of the world takes a few seconds. You can also sign up to automatically receive newsletters and other information, delivered directly to your computer.

File Transfer Protocol

Web pages are transferred between computers using the HTTP protocol, with other types of files sent using FTP. Users can share files, such as music and videos between themselves and the rest of the world by uploading them to a server and then allowing others to download them to their own computers.

Internet Relay Chat

IRC is a service allowing you to connect to your chosen channel and talk to others with the same interests. By downloading an appropriate programme, you can start chatting right away.

USENET

USENET (Unix User Network) is a system of bulletin boards whereby messages and points of view can be posted to be read and replied to. Similar to IRC, all sorts of topics are discussed and a wide range of groups take part.

There is no doubt that the Internet will have an increasing influence on the world in future.
